1. At the end of the year 1950, about the time the Chinese Communist delegates to the United Nations returned to China, the Chinese Communist Government adopted the following policies:
  - a. When the Chinese Communists take Seoul they will start a peace propaganda campaign, in an effort to force the United States to accept their peace terms.
  - b. They will intensify their efforts to break the solidarity among the Western powers by promoting discord between the United States and Britain.
  - c. They will strengthen relations with countries recognizing their Government so as to use them, particularly India. They plan to weaken Anglo-American control of the United Nations.
  - d. They will make efforts to induce as many countries as possible to keep the United States from resorting to atomic weapons.
  - e. They will make efforts to get countries taking a more or less neutral stand in the United Nations on the East-West conflict to establish diplomatic relations with Communist China.
2. The Chinese Communists are now irrevocably committed to a course of action which moderates in the Party and members of the minority parties in the Government deplore but cannot alter. This is the policy to embark on a generally offensive course throughout Asia. This will require the authorities to double the size of the armed forces, convert the economy to a full-time war basis, stringently tighten internal security measures and purge all potential dissidents.

3. Until September 1950 the moderates, who are nationalist in policy, had a majority of one in the Central Executive Committee of the Party. Two members of the Committee, however, changed their views at this time under pressure of certain Soviets in China and of certain Chinese who advocate world Communism.
